Community Updates and Q&A – Colorado State Forest Service

Kamie Long, Western Colorado Urban and Community Forestry Program Specialist with the Colorado State Forest, shared updates on projects, programs, and upcoming events. She reported that 400 acres on the Grand Mesa have been pruned to enhance forest resilience and mitigate wildfire risk, and outlined forestry programs underway at Vega State Park focused on forest health, wildlife habitat improvement, and fire mitigation.

Kamie also provided an update regarding the Grand Junction Forestry Board, of which she is a member, noting that the board is currently updating their ordinances. She explained that the City of Grand Junction manages right-of-way trees, unlike other cities, with the exception of watering. She further discussed a Federal Inflation Reduction Act (IRA) grant awarded to the Colorado Forest Service, which was dispersed through the Grand Junction community to support the installation of water meters on private property, allowing for additional trees to be planted.

Kamie also outlined ongoing outreach efforts, including hosting a booth at Downtown Grand Junction's Market on Main from July through September, and a radio show, "Western Slope Outdoors," which airs on KFM on the last Tuesday of each month at 12:00 p.m. MST. Kamie mentioned details about Arbor Day at Lincoln Park in April, where the Forest Service will distribute baby seedlings grown in Fort Collins at the Colorado State Forest Service Nursery, along with a silent auction for larger trees, and a kids' tree-planting activity.

A discussion followed regarding the types of trees planted in Grand Junction, as well as the prevention and treatment for insect infestations.

Elizabeth Fogarty thanked Kamie for the update and asked if there was anything Visit Grand Junction could do to further assist or improve the partnership with the Colorado Forest Service. Discussion included collaborating on a blog highlighting the Downtown tree walk, local arboretums, or the types of trees in the area.
