21. General architectural description: This is a horizontally proportioned wood frame house with a low pitched hipped roof. The main ridge runs northeast/southwest and the principal façade faces southeast. The principal façade has a hipped roof projecting volume on the left side and the north part of the volume is recessed under the hipped roof form. A large sliding window sits on the southeast corner of the projecting volume and the main wall plane carries across the recess with a low brick wall. A pair of metal columns support the overhanging corner of the hipped roof. The main entry door is located on the street facing wall under the recess. A concrete landing infills the area of the recess and three steps run from the north side to the grade. A large picture window, flanked by casements sits on the main wall to the right of the entry door. A rectangular rusticated brick chimney engages the main wall plane and runs back into the plane of the roof. A fixed window with a casement to the left side sits on the corner of the remaining wall to the right of the chimney. The same unit appears on the corner of the northeast façade. A hipped roof wing continues along the northeast and has an enclosed porch and a garage under its form.

neighborhood layout are all indicative of the national trends which were driven by the proliferation of the automobile and the enormous demand for single family homes. House designs departed from the romantic and revival styles that were prevalent in the earlier part of the 20th century and took on a California inspired design that was characterized by simple horizontally proportioned forms. Houses were typically mass produced on previously undeveloped tracts of land at the periphery of earlier development. These groups of houses were typically based on one or two plan types with a limited number of roof and exterior finish variations, further reinforcing the characteristics of mass production. This house is an example of the more substantial and individualized homes that skirt Sherwood Park. In particular, this house may have been designed by an architect. The forms and materials are particularly well considered.

43. Assessment of historic physical integrity related to significance: The house is generally intact, some alterations have had a minor impact on the integrity.
